A) Comprehension:

The Tuareg, who call themselves ‘Kel Tamasheq’, lived in five African states: Algeria, Libya, Mali, Niger and Burkina Faso. In the past, they were nomads whose economy revolved around livestock breeding, but today many of them have become sedentary and cultivate the land. Tuareg men, called ‘the blue men of the Sahara’, veil their faces and are legendary fearless warriors. They have preserved a script (Tifinagh) consisting of purely geometric signs that are marked by the ancient Libyan alphabet.

Tuareg society is traditionally organized along the lines of a social class system headed by a nobility of warriors and Quran scholars. These are followed by a class of servants known as ‘Imrad’, who formerly had to pay tribute to the nobility. Then, come their slaves or ‘Ikkan’ that were taken from among the Black African population on invasions, and were employed as serfs and herdsmen. Today, they are free and adapted better to the structural change than their former masters. The lowest class was composed of metal workers particularly feared for their power over the element of fire. These metal workers produce all the main implements and weaponry for the Tuareg.

Tuareg women, known as Targia, enjoy complete freedom including the right to divorce and choose their own husbands and unlike many other peoples, it is the men, and not the women, who cover their faces.
